the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased from 10.5 million to 13.5 million (19.5% of the population).

There are a number of reasons why the number of people aged 65 and over has increased. One of the main reasons is that people are living longer. The life expectancy at birth in the UK is now 78 years for men and 82 years for women (ONS 2003).

Another reason is that people are spending more of their lives in retirement. The state pension age is now 65 for men and 63 for women (ONS 2003). This means that people are spending more of their lives in retirement than in the past.

There are a number of challenges that the UK faces as a result of the increasing number of people aged 65 and over. One of the main challenges is the need for more care and support for older people. The cost of care and support for older people is increasing rapidly.

Another challenge is the need for more housing for older people. The number of people aged 65 and over who live in private rented accommodation is increasing. This is because many older people are unable to afford to buy their own homes.

There are a number of ways in which the UK can meet the challenges of the increasing number of people aged 65 and over. One way is to increase the state pension age. This would help to reduce the number of people in retirement and the cost of care and support for older people.

Another way is to increase the number of people who work in retirement. This would help to reduce the number of people in retirement and the cost of care and support for older people.

There are a number of other ways in which the UK can meet the challenges of the increasing number of people aged 65 and over. These include increasing the number of people who live in their own homes and increasing the number of people who live in private rented accommodation.

The UK faces a number of challenges as a result of the increasing number of people aged 65 and over. It is important that the UK takes action to meet these challenges in order to ensure that older people can live well in retirement.
